More than 1, daily records for cold were tied or broken in the last week of December, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. A similar phenomenon was seen at the end of October, when warm air from the remnants of a tropical cyclone over the Atlantic collided with a cold front coming from the Midwest. The low temperatures will be degrees below normal in parts of the Northeast, with the mercury rising to only the single digits and teens during the day, then dropping to near or below zero at night, the National Weather Service said.

The situation is aggravated by the lack of fuel for electric power, meaning that a person walks by a steam vent in Boston on December Thursday, firefighters and the National Guard scrambled to rescue dozens of coastal residents stranded by freezing water pushing from the Atlantic.
