To render similar winter beauty in your garden, look for plants that develop beautiful withered leaves and stems, dried flower heads, seedpods.

These plants hate to be over watered. Allow to dry somewhat between waterings. Don't use tap water (too much salt and other toxic chemicals).

The chemical fertilizers have killed all the microbes present in the soil. It would appear your plant is in desperate need of more root room - either larger pot or to be planted out in a suitable spot. All have varieties with doubled red flowers. Come on, this is a plant that grows somewhere on some cliffs where it gets scorching sun during the day, really cold during the night, and the occasional torrent of rain, plus, this particular one lived on some street for a while and God knows where before. They didn't look like they were taken particularly good care of, nor like they needed it. PostYourAnswerDiscardByclicking"PostYourAnswer", you acknowledge that you got scared and figured low turgor means too little water, and thus watered it a lot and afterwards read online that you should not water it too much The effect of these chemical fertilizers stays for about months.
