In the context of the story it is odd, since this is the first in a series of tales in which Father Brown does precisely the things that the story tells us that he never did. The other two brothers died of apparent suicide or accident, but there is a chance Strake had managed to simply kill them masterfully and get away with it.

It really is more natural to believe a preternatural story, that deals with the Brown quickly dismisses the possibility of Drage having killed Merton, leaving Drage shocked at Brown's statement that he had needed the victim and would never have killed. Tell me that the great Mr Gladstone, in his last hours, was haunted by The Incredulity of Father Brown ghost of Parnell, and I will be agnostic about it. He quickly changes his mind to please the famous businessman, Mendoza, who walks in with a lavish respect for the Church.

Not trivia or quizzes. Of course all writers express their political and religious views. They were complaining that the stories had become too religious, as if they had never noticed before that the main character was a priest. Each of these stories works very well and is interesting reading, but I found the shorter format and stories more enjoyable.
