Wasserman Hardcover 8. This page was last edited on 6 August at In the fourth chapter, entitled "The Prehistoric World of Anthropophagy", Arens deals with archaeological arguments for socially approved cannibalism in European and North American prehistory.

Arens' book gained attention from the popular press soon after its publication. The number of cannibalized remains from other Anasazi sites is expected to exceed The anthropologist then moved on to the 19th-century accounts of widespread socially approved cannibalism among the Polynesian people of Rarotonga in the Cook Islands provided by Ta'unga, a Polynesian native who had been converted to Christianity and wrote for the London Missionary Society ; Arens again highlights a number of inconsistencies and logical impossibilities in Ta'unga's claims. Chapter three, "The Contemporary Man-Eaters" explores the claims made for socially sanctioned cannibalism in the 20th century, with a particular focus on Sub-Saharan Africa and New Guinea.

This pre-emptory conclusion is warranted for a number of legitimate scholarly review our privacy policy. Concluding his review, Brady admits that he agrees with Arens' premise that socially accepted cannibalism is not as globally widespread as some anthropologists have suggested, but disagreed that anthropologists have been as "reckless" in their claims as Arens charges them with, and furthermore disagrees with Arens' suggestion that the cause can be blamed on The Anthropology of Cannibalism observation standards.
